Excerpt: .a little can do no harm, for fermentation is self-sustaining and, like fire, when once started, a small beginning may have a big ending. The bitter orange marmalade, owing to its bitter principle, excites the secretion of the gastric juice and it also has ferment-retarding properties, which render it acceptable to almost any stomach when eaten with food as a relish. Orange marmalade is well adapted for use at lunches, particularly for school children. Pineapple marmalade is also a very wholesome and desirable relish, having, as has been seen, a digestive power of its own. Guava jelly is very rich in pectine and contains no free acid. It is very nourishing, does not easily ferment, and may be permitted to children. A fine variety of jams, marmalades and jellies is prepared in California, which contain nothing but the fruit and pure sugar, and hence are much to be preferred to others on the market, which are so uniformly sophisticated and compounded with commercial glucose. It must be borne in mind that all fruits and vegetables in their fresh state are anti-scorbutics, but when dried, canned or preserved, they entirely lose this property of preventing scurvy. This applies no more to fruits than to vegetables, and no more to vegetable foods than to animal foods, for, as has been hereinbefore shown, the element of freshness is the one that prevents scurvy. The second use of fruits then, as anti-scorbutics, is fully answered in what has...
