It may be observed, that many explosions have occurred on Monday mornings after the boilers had been recently cleaned out, an operation which is frequently performed on the Sunday evenings; and from the necessary haste in such cases, a careless engineer will only imperfectly refill the boiler with water. To the above ten requisites it is almost necessary to add, that should there be other boilers working in connexion with the one that has burst, it may be useful to have a somewhat similar description of them as of the one in question, A few particulars may also be required with respect to the engine itself. 1. The size or power of the engine--that is, its reputed horse-power. Where this is not easily obtained, it may be very readily estimated by allowing 25 circular inches, area of the cylinder for each horse-power, that is, divide the square of the cylinders diameter in inches by 25, and the result wilt always give a fnir average for the Boulton and Watt, or low-pressure engine. 2. The kind of engine, that is, whether ft low-pressure condensing-engine, generally called a Boulton and Watt engine, or a highpressure non-condensing engine, sometimes called the Trevithick engine; there is also another kind of steam-engine, said to combine the advantages of both the other kinds, called the high-pressure condensing-engine, but this last is rarely to be met with out of Cornwall. Should this paper meet your approval, I shall be glad to return to...
